Claims for:

Open Letter Electronic Influencing Intercommunication System

As the inventor of this computer process and method I make the following claims:

1. To the uniqueness and novelty of this system to accomplish more effectively and capably and economically what here-to-fore has been accomplished through the printed word in newspapers and the like –faster and easier through the speed of computing and across the Internet.

2. To the uniqueness and novelty of this system to accomplish more effectively and capably and economically what here-to-fore has been accomplished through the printed word in newspapers and the like – a better result through the wider dissemination of the user's communication by using the Internet to achieve a greater moral and economic importance.

3. To the uniqueness and novelty of this system to accomplish more effectively and capably and economically what here-to-fore has been accomplished through the printed word in newspapers and the like –more influentially through the users easier ability to search a large data base used by such search engines as Google and Yahoo, thereby being able to immediately apply the gleaned information to his or her personal use, through certain previously known communication processes, to a larger potential audience usually when the desired response sought by the user is not forthcoming.
